Due to his activities, Austrian monarchists in U.S. have reached new level of prestige; rumour has arisen among anti-monarchists that he is to head an Austrian Legion, and also that his subordinate, Hans ROTT, is trying to build up a monarchist mass movement in U.S.; this has antagonized socialist and independent groups, and their opposition has been voiced by Freiheit fuer Oesterreich, organ of socialist Assembly for Democratic Austrian Republic, and by Count Ferdinand CZERNIN (q.v.), head of independent faction; as a result of this increasing conflict between monarchists, socialists, and independents, the Austrian National Committee, founded in Jan. '42 with purpose of uniting all factions, finds itself in an increasingly difficult position, and in such financial straits

Bavarian royalists who really feel that Austria and Bavaria belong together think little of him, as do the Wittelsbachs; feel he has nothing to offer but his charm, and has been travelling around on money given by "ambitious old women in skirts or trousers who would like to play a role at a future Habsburg court"; source heard from middle-class Viennese in 1940 that Otto was a pansy; the more manly Luitpold von WITTELSBACH (see Germany) seems a much more desirable royal possibility.

Formation of Military Committee for Liberation of Austria, under his chairmanship and the sponsorship of U.S. Government has been criticized by almost all Central European representatives in U.S. / recruiting continues with a little success, but all non-monarchist Austrians feel that it has merely deepened split in ranks of Austrians in exile and discredited idea of a revived National Austria; however, its formation has resulted in merger of Center groups under F. HAGEN, PAUL

Austrian; member of Communist party from 1918, and editor for some years of Die Rote Fahne; applied in 1931 for membership in Social Democrat Party, at which time a few Marxist intellectuals formed a group within it called Neu Beginnen; the purpose of this group was to combat Nazism by healing Communist-Socialist labor split. it was repudiated by Social-Democratic leaders but continued to claim membership in the party; by 1940 its platform had changed radically: it rejected Communism and supported an independent and socialist movement in Germany; Hagen settled in N.Y. in 1940 and was enthusiastically received by American liberals but bitterly opposed by old-line Social Democrats who accused him of misuse of funds and exaggeration of his underground contacts in Germany; he demanded a hearing to answer these charges, and a commission of inquiry was set up, headed by Brissenden and, later, Romualdi (q.v.), and which disbanded without coming to any conclusion; all agree to his sincere anti-Nazi and present anti-Communist convictions, while many stress the value of his underground work in Germany prior to 1938; he believes labor movement represents only anti-Hitler movement in Germany and only basis for post-war reconstruction; advocates Austrian inclusion in the Reich, equal participation for Germany in a European Federation; opposes unilateral disarmament, occupation of Germany, and all political and military safety belts to quarantine her; his activities in this country supported chiefly by American Friends of German Freedom; member of Goldsmith Group; married to Anna Caples (q.v.), Executive Secretary of American Friends of German Freedom.
